As the Great War in Europe had a global reach and impact on the balance of power, so the Great War in North America – the US entry into the war against Imperial Germany, had an equally global impact. It marked a defining moment in the history of both nations and the world. In the first days of April, by early 1918, the Germans had lost the war on the eastern front and the Western Front was stabilised. In April 1917 they had lost over 600,000 men killed in the war, at a cost of 150,000 men killed, wounded or missing and 450,000 men captured. The price in lives and material resources was extraordinarily high. In the autumn of 1917 the German High Command issued a warning, not of the new offensive with which spring was accompanied, but of the coming winter and the difficulties it was going to present for Germany. General Erich Ludendorff stressed the increasing difficulties of supply. While the German People voted in the summer of 1917 for the continuation of the war, the French, British and Americans, with the new American President in office, believed they could be successful in ending the war by negotiation. The Paris Peace Conference (the League of Nations) was held from January to December, when a number of treaties were signed, including the Treaty of Versailles. April 1918 was a month of exception for the fighting in France, as it coincided with an Easter period of religious celebrations in which many French troops took a rest and did not fight. In America, the previous November, the 18th amendment to the US Constitution had been introduced which gave the prohibition against the manufacture, sale and transportation of alcohol in the country, as part of the law. As in every action, those in authority were not always in agreement. The supporters of the US President were vociferous and active but the opponents of Woodrow Wilson were also vocal. Their opposition might have been based on a wider criticism of the other nations, which was seen as 'Woodrow Wilson's War'. Within America, many were aware of the growing hardship that the war had been causing and they were critical of the increased controls imposed by the Federal government, and of the sacrifice of liberty by the American people. Injection molding typically comprises injecting a melt material, such as plastic, into a mold cavity and then hardening the melt material to form a molded part or article. However, it can be difficult to inject the melt material into the mold cavity or even to remove the molded part or article when the size of the part or article is relatively large. This can be true, for example, with relatively large scale or large-volume parts or articles such as, for example, automobile parts. Injection molding of large parts or articles can be challenging because of the necessary molding machines that are typically used to manufacture the parts or articles. Such molding machines can include clamping systems that are capable of applying large forces to the mold. The clamping systems can typically include a heated platen that can be maneuvered into the mold. However, such heated platens can be large and cumbersome to use. Further, such heated platens can be inefficient./ * * * @file * * The ST25912 is a DMA controller with audio and video peripherals. // * Copyright (c) 2006-2008, Internet Systems Consortium, Inc.
